On one hand, providing solid grades can help parents understand their child's academic standing and areas for improvement. Students can also analyze themselves and determine future actions based on this information. However, others argue that the conventional grading scheme has limitations and may not be the most effective way to measure progress. Students must strive to do their best next time and aim for higher grades, leading to a more competitive environment. The grading system may appear biased, with teachers evaluating students based on individual performance or comparison. Grades should not be considered the ultimate measure of a child's progress. A student might thoroughly understand the material but struggle to express it in the same way, making grades a subjective method that can lead to self-doubt. Therefore, alternative report cards like checklists are more suitable for showcasing performance and judging growth.
